Federal and state regulators are beginning to understand the potential future impact of blockchain technology. States around the country are adopting blockchain legislative frameworks and even skeptical companies like JP Morgan Chase are finding ways to use the technology for anything from supply chain management to faster payment processing. In Congress, blockchain technology is seemingly one of the few issues legislators have been able to collaborate on across party lines, fostering a legislative environment friendly to the technology. The goal of this panel is to move beyond the promises of blockchain technology and examine the real-world applications currently employed by business and government. Moderator: Dina Ellis-Rochkind, Paul Hastings Panelists: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Bill Rockwood, Rep. Around that same time, the smartphones craze was just starting: Apple launched the first-generation iPhone just over a year before the crash of Lehman Brothers. While regulators have been trying to learn from the hard lessons of 2008 to prevent another financial meltdown, technology has transformed how American consumers interact with financial products. The goal of this panel is to examine consumer protection and welfare under the modern, tech-driven financial system. Moderator: Beau Brunson, Consumers' Research Panelists: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Banking Commissioner Gerald Little, New Hampshire Banking Department</li> <li>• Tom Miller, Mississippi State University</li> <li>• Representative Christy Bartlett, New Hampshire House of Representatives</li> <li>• Kyle Burgess, Deloitte</li> </ul>	Reagan Room

Consumer data is big business and a tempting target for cyber criminals. In recent years, literally billions of consumers have had their personal data stolen by online hackers. Failed company polices bear some of the blame. Some attacks may have been orchestrated by foreign governments. Regardless of how they happen, ultimately, it is the consumer that pays the cost of a data breach. This panel will examine the role companies and regulators play to ensure that consumer data is protected. Moderator: Brian Knight, The Mercatus Center Panelists: <ul style="list-style-type: none"> <li>• Jennifer Huddleston, The Mercatus Center</li> <li>• Ashley Baker, Committee for Justice</li> <li>• AJ Nash, Cyber Intelligence Specialist</li> <li>• Joe Conway, Consumers' Research</li> </ul>	Reagan Room
